HISTORICAL SKETCH.

THE Empire of Japan consists of three large islands, containing, respectively, not far from 100,000, 16,000 and 10-000 square miles, and surrounded by many smaller islands, making in all an extent of territory variously estimated, but probably amounting to about 160,000 square miles. The population is dense, numbering, as is supposed, from 30,000, 000 to 40,000,000. The surface of the country is much broken by hills and valleys, but the soil is fertile and almost everywhere well cultivated, producing a good variety of grains, vegetables, and fruits. Minerals are abundant — gold, silver, copper, tin, lead, mercury, coal, sulphur, salt, etc. It is, writes Mr. Blodget, of the North China mission, “a land of hills and valleys and lofty mountains ; a land of pure air, clear streams, running brooks and fountains of water ; a land abounding in trees and flowers of numerous varieties, and rich in productions useful for food, for man and beast.” The civilization of the Japanese, peculiar, but very considerably advanced, is supposed to be of Chinese origin. Chinese is their learned language, Chinese classics have been the text-books in their schools, and many Chinese words have become incorporated in their language. The prevailing religion has been Buddhism. The people are represented as of middling size ; tawny complexion, with black, glossy hair ; active, lively, quick of apprehension ; exhibiting more intelligence than is common among Asiatics. Education, to some extent, is almost universal, “the poorest and lowest laborers being taught to read and write ;” printers and book-sellers are numerous, and the literature is somewhat extensive. Many mechanical arts are carried to a high degree of perfection, and commercial operations are conducted, sometimes on a very extensive scale, with promptness and accuracy. Indeed, the Japanese would seem to need nothing but the pervading influence of a pure religion, to give them a high position among the nations of the earth.

The existence of such a people was first made known in Europe by the Venetian, Marco Polo, who returned from his travels in 1295. His statements, however, respecting this and other lands, were generally rejected as utterly incredible, and for about two hundred and fifty years after his time there seems to have been no European intercourse with the empire. About the year 1543, Pinto, one of the many Portuguese adventurers then crowding to the East, driven by a storm, landed on one of the Japan islands. He was well received, and carried to his countrymen such a report of the riches of the country as led many traders and adventurers there, and a Portuguese settlement was soon established.

Papal missionaries, if they did not at first accompany the merchants, followed them almost immediately, the celebrated Francis Xavier, with his companions, reaching Japan in 1549. At this time there seems to have been little prejudice or opposition. Both merchants and missionaries were favorably received. Soon after the introduction of Christianity, the emperor is said to have replied to some of the heathen priests, who requested him to prohibit the foreign faith, by asking how many religions there were in the empire. Being told that there were thirty-five, he remarked : “ When thirty-five religions are tolerated we can easily bear with thirty-six ; leave the strangers in peace.” Xavier remained two years, and laborers and converts rapidly multiplied around him.

About thirty years later, in 1582, Japanese Christians sent an embassy, with letters and presents to the Pope at Rome, and after their return converts were still more increased; so that in the course of two years (1591-2) it is said 12,000 persons were baptized. Persecutions, however, had already commenced, or at least opposition, an edict for the banishment of missionaries having been issued in 1587, and before the close of the century there were repeated cases of martyrdom.

Allured by the success of the Portuguese, the Dutch East India Company sent out merchant vessels for Japan in 1598, one of which reached there in 1600. Others followed, in 1609; and the same year a port was granted to that company, and a factory, or trading settlement was established. The new settlers seem to have had an eye to trade alone, making no religious demonstrations, willing to renounce even all the forms of Christianity for the sake of gain. Already the Government had become distrustful of the Portuguese, whose success had made them haughty, arrogant, and incautious. Portugal was then united with Spain, and a Spaniard being asked by the emperor how their king had managed to possess himself of half the world, is said to have intimated, in reply, that having first sent priests to convert the people, the native Christians would join his troops, and conquest was easy. As might have been expected, such a reply made a deep impression on the mind of the emperor. The Dutch, at war with Portugal, and seeking their own advantage, were not likely to do anything to allay suspicion; difficulties, commenced before their arrival, continued and increased; the Christians took no measures to pacify the Government, but defying it, rather, began to destroy idols and heathen temples, and severe persecutions followed, in 1612 and 1614. In 1622, there was a frightful massacre of Christians in the neighborhood of Nagasaki, with horrible tortures inflicted upon many, in the vain attempt to make them renounce a faith declared to be infamous and rebellious. In 1629, there were still numbered in the empire 400,000 Christians, but twenty years later, one hundred years after the first arrival of Xavier, there remained none. Driven to despair, they were said to have entered into a conspiracy with the Portuguese, to overthrow the imperial throne ; by the close of 1639, the Portuguese were entirely expelled, and their trade transferred to the Dutch ; the native Christians, still defending themselves, took possession of a strong castle in Simabara, but were at length overpowered, by the aid of Dutch artillery and military science, and utterly destroyed, to the number of 37,000, about the year 1640. In 1641, the Dutch were ordered to leave their position at Firando, and take up their residence on the little island of Desima, at the port of Nagasaki, where they were placed under rigid inspection, and where, for more than two hundred years, they retained the undisturbed monopoly of European trade with Japan. The English, and the Russians, meantime, made several unsuccessful attempts to establish commercial intercourse, and some unavailing efforts were put forth by Papal missionaries to regain a footing in the empire ; but by Protestants, no attempt has been made to preach the gospel there until within the last few years. An edict was published, soon after the destruction of the Christians, which has remained in force until very recently, offering a reward to any who should inform against Christians, if there were such still undiscovered (about $500 to " whoever informs on a padre," and $300 to " whoever informs on a Roman "). From that time to very near the present the most bitter hostility to Christianity has been cherished, and it has been a capital crime to become a disciple of Christ.

Within a few years, efforts on the part of Christian nations to overcome the long-continued exclusiveness of Japan, and establish diplomatic and commercial relations with the empire, have been more earnestly prosecuted, and crowned, at last, with success. In 1846, an expedition from the United States was conducted by Commodore Biddle, designed, if possible, to open friendly negotiations ; but it accomplished nothing. In 1849, Captain Glynn, of the United States ship Preble, rescued from Japan some shipwrecked American seamen, who had been imprisoned nearly seventeen months and treated with great severity; but he was not permitted to remain, or to communicate with the people. In 1852, the United States Government dispatched an expedition under command of Commodore Perry, who was instructed to demand protection for American seamen and ships wrecked on the coast, and if possible to conclude a treaty by which American vessels should be permitted to enter at least one port, to obtain supplies and for purposes of trade. Perry entered the bay of Yedo, and after much difficult negotiation, succeeded in delivering to high officials a letter addressed to the Emperor by the President of the United States. In February, 1854, he entered the same bay again, with a squadron of seven ships of war, and came to anchor a few miles from the capital; and on the 31st of March, a treaty was agreed upon. Simoda and Hakodadi were designated as ports which American ships might visit to obtain supplies, arrangements were made for the residence of United States consuls at those ports, protection and assistance were guaranteed to shipwrecked seamen, and liberty to trade, under certain restrictions, was granted. Treaties with other nations, and further concessions, soon followed. An English squadron entered the harbor of Nagasaki in September of the same year, and a treaty was concluded with Great Britain by which that port and Hakodadi were opened to British commerce. The Russians soon obtained like privileges, and in November, 1855, the Dutch secured relief from most of the restrictions so long imposed upon them. In June, 1857, Mr. Townsend Harris, United States consul-general for Japan, negotiated a new treaty at Simoda, by which additional privileges were secured to American merchants, and after July 4, 1858, Americans were permitted to reside at Simoda and Hakodadi. In 1858, he succeeded in reaching Yedo, and concluded a still more favorable treaty, making provision for opening the ports of Kanagawa (a suburb of Yedo, substituted for Simoda), Nagasaki, and Hakodadi to general trade, within one year, and of Hiogo, the harbor of a most important commercial city, Osaka, in 1860; and for the residence of an American ambassador at Yedo.

It is worthy of grateful mention, that in the instructions given to Mr. Harris by Mr. Marcy, the United States Secretary of State, he was directed to do his best, by all judicious measures, to obtain full toleration of the Christian religion, and protection for missionaries who might go there to promulgate this religion. Mr. Harris's own desires were fully in accordance with such instructions, and the treaty did provide for the free exercise of their religion by Americans in Japan, with liberty to erect places of worship. The Japanese commissioners, in accordance with the long-continued policy of the empire, attempted to place Christianity and Christian teaching among the forbidden articles of importation; but all such propositions were repelled with firmness, and were consequently withdrawn. The custom of trampling on the cross was to be abolished, but no liberty was secured for the Japanese to embrace Christianity, or for foreigners to propagate its doctrines. Indeed, it was expressly stipulated, that nothing should be done "calculated to excite religious animosity." Within the same year a British ambassador, the Earl of Elgin, was conveyed to Yedo, and concluded a new treaty, based on that negotiated by Mr. Harris, but securing some additional concessions.

Protestant Missionary Efforts.

By these treaties, and others with Christian nations, great progress was made towards the full opening of Japan for intercourse with other lands, and apparently for the re-introduction of Christianity. Yet the hopes and expectations which were thus excited, were not all warranted even by the treaty stipulations; and certainly not by the past history of Japan, the known aversion to intercourse with foreigners, the bitter, long-continued hostility to Christianity, or the peculiar and not well understood character of the Government, — the relations of the two Emperors, as they were sometimes called, the civil (Tycoon) and the spiritual (Mikado), to each other, and of the many hereditary princes, sovereigns to a great extent, within their own dominions, to the supreme authority. A prominent clergyman in the United States remarked, in an address delivered in February, 1859, and subsequently published: "Mr. Harris has expressly secured the right of Christian teaching, and of building Christian churches in Japan, which shall be unmo- lested and protected; and by his eminently wise and suc- cessful services as a negotiator, American Protestant Chris- tianity is to enjoy unlimited freedom of establishment and propagation in this new and wonderful field." The state- ment is quoted only to show how glowing were the antici- pations too readily indulged by many. No such "unlimited freedom of propagation" had been secured for the Protestant or any other form of Christianity. In the good providence of God, however, great changes had been effected, and there was reason for the hope that others would follow in due time. Christian missionaries could enter the empire, as citizens of other nations, and reside at some designated places; could study the language, and thus be preparing themselves for future labors; and might find the way open- ing before them more and more fully. Accordingly, several missionary societies in the United States at once turned their attention to the new field.

In February, 1858, Dr. Boone (missionary Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States to China), then in this country, sent for publication in the "Spirit of Missions," a letter from an officer in the United States Navy, dated at Hakodadi, Japan, October 2, 1857, which expressed the opinion that the time had come for sending missionaries — prudent men, of tried experience — who "must remember that it is death to a Japanese to become a Christian," and must not "rush headlong into the work, without considering secondary means;" but who, if judicious, would probably "meet with as much encouragement as they generally do when first commencing operations in heathen lands." On the 14th of February, 1859, the Foreign Committee of the Episcopal Board of Missions formally determined to enter upon work in Japan, and appointed Rev. Messrs. John Liggins and C. M. Williams, then of the China mission, to commence at Nagasaki.

Before these brethren received the intelligence of their appointment, one of them, Mr. Liggins, acting under medical advice, was already at Nagasaki, to try what reinvigorating power there might be in the climate of that place. He arrived there May 2d, 1859, two months before the time when, by treaty stipulations, he would be allowed to take up his residence in the city; but, assisted by Mr. Walsh, United States consul, and promising to instruct a class of government interpreters who were anxious to learn English, he soon succeeded in getting permission to remain, and in obtaining part of a good house, in a beautiful situation. Mr. Williams joined him in July. Thus was commenced "the first Protestant mission actually established in that empire."

It was soon apparent that the encouragement was not likely to be all that had been hoped. There had been reaction at Yedo against the liberal measures, with degradation of the ministry and the appointment of those in favor of the old, exclusive policy. The prohibitory edict against Christianity remained unrepealed. Mr. Harris believed it would never be enforced, but still thought it best for missionaries to confine themselves to the sale of books, as the only safe ground. The Annual Report of the Foreign Committee for 1860 says: "The experience of the past year has deepened the impression expressed in 1859, touching the necessity of extreme caution in the prosecution of the work in Japan," and in October of that year, the Foreign Committee again reported, that they were not advised of any freer opportunity for direct missionary effort than when the former Report was made. The missionaries could, as stated by Mr. Liggins, procure native books and teachers, and acquire the language ; prepare philological works to facilitate its acquisition by others ; dispose, by sale, of many historical, geographical, and scientific works, prepared by Protestant missionaries ; sell the Scriptures and religious books and tracts in the Chinese language, understood by every educated Japanese ; answer the inquiries of persons coming for such books to their own houses, and thus explain to many the doctrines of Christianity and urge its claims upon them ; and by their Christian walk and conversation, by kindness and benevolence, weaken and dispel prejudice.

Mr. Williams wrote, June 18, 1861 : " There is no proper missionary work to report. . . . It may appear singular that so little has been accomplished ; but the peculiar difficulties of our situation, — the antecedents of Christianity in Japan, the jealousy of government, the sweeping clause in the treaty, that ' Americans shall not do anything calculated to excite religious animosity,' the ramifications of the system of espionage, reaching everywhere, alike the cottage of the poor, and the ' forbidden inclosure' of the ' Son of Heaven,' — should all be kept in mind. When these things are fully comprehended, it will be seen that great caution is necessary. A false step may be fatal, and surround us with such a host of spies, that intercourse with the people will be virtually cut off. Though the practice of trampling on religious emblems is abolished, still the law against Christianity is unrepealed. . . . The means used by the authorities to prevent converts to Christianity being made, are most thorough, and if strictly observed would be most effectual. . . . Each individual is compelled to sign a paper once a year, declaring that he or she is not a Christian, also specifying the sect of Buddhists to which he belongs. . . . They offer large rewards to all who inform of those who become Christians."

In such circumstances not much progress was made, and after a few years the work of this church in Japan, which had been connected with its China missions, seems to have died out or been discontinued. In his Report of 1868, the Bishop to China says: "It is heart-sickening to report that our Church has not a single representative" in Japan. Two missionaries, since appointed, are supposed to have sailed from San Francisco for that field in December, 1872.

As early as 1855, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States requested one of its missionaries in China to visit Japan and make inquiries, preparatory to sending forth laborers to this "long inaccessible field." In 1859, the door seeming to be open, and some candidates for the missionary work having expressed a desire to be sent to that land, it was resolved to commence a mission. Dr. James C. Hepburn and wife, formerly missionaries in China, but then in the United States, were at their own request appointed to the work, as were also Rev. John L. Nevius and wife, then of the Ningpo mission. Dr and Mrs. Hepburn sailed from New York for Shanghai on the 24th of April, and from Shanghai for Kanagawa, October 1. In January, 1873, five missionaries were connected with the Japan mission of the Presbyterian Board, and it was then stated that others, under appointment, would sail in a few months for that field.

The Board of the Reformed Protestant (Dutch) Church in the United States, about the close of 1858, were moved to efforts in Japan, (1) by letters from Christian brethren of several denominations then in that empire, urging the work upon them especially, as those who could avail themselves of the Dutch language, and (2) by an almost simultaneous consecration of means, by brethren of the South Church in New York, for missionary effort there. One of the pastors in Central New York also solicited a missionary appointment to that field. The Board, therefore, deemed it duty to attempt a new mission in Japan; and Rev. S. R.

Brown, of Owasco, was appointed as a missionary. A young Holland brother, just completing his theological studies, and a medical missionary, were soon secured as his associates. The company sailed from New York, May 7, 1859, consisting of Rev. S. R. Brown, Rev. G. F. Verbeck, and Dr. D. Simmons, with their wives, and Miss Julia Brown. It was understood that their work must be for a time, perhaps a considerable time, preparatory; and that "the churches should exercise all patience in looking for results." This Board had, at the close of its last year, five male laborers in that field; but the brethren of this mission have been largely engaged in educational work, receiving much of their support from the Japanese Government.

The English Church Missionary Society reports two missionaries in that empire, and by some other societies and individuals, evangelistic work has been or is about to be attempted there.

It was certainly to be expected, that the Papal Church would not be unmindful of the renewed opening of a land from which its adherents were banished more than 200 years ago, and in January, 1862, religious services were commenced in a new Roman Catholic church at Yokohama, — "a neat and conspicuous building of white stucco," erected on ground given for the purpose by the French minister. Thus the Romanists were in advance of any Protestant denomination in the completion of a church building in Japan. The last Report of the Roman Catholic Association for the Propagation of the Faith gives one bishop and fourteen "missioners" as their force in Japan.

At the annual meeting of the A. B. C. F. M. held at Pittsburgh, Penn., in 1869, the Board fully and heartily approved of the proposal submitted by the Prudential Committee to establish a mission in Japan, and on the fourth of the next month (November, 1869), Rev. Daniel Crosby Greene, son of a former secretary of the Board, sailed from San Francisco with his wife, to commence the mission. They reached Yokohama on the 30th of the same month. After spending a few months at Yedo, and after consultation with Mr. Blodget, of the North China mission, and others, Mr. Greene fixed upon Kobe, a town of some 65,000 inhabitants, about twenty miles from Osaka, 350 miles from Yedo, on a bay of the inland sea in the central portion of the island of Nippon, as the best place for the first station of the mission, and he was soon established there. After something more than a year, Rev. and Mrs. O. H. Gulick joined him, arriving at Kobe March 3. Rev. J. D. Davis and wife arrived on the first of December following, Dr. J. C. Berry and wife on the 27th of May, 1872, and Rev. M. L. Gordon, M. D., and his wife, in October, 1872. A new station was taken at Osaka, in the summer of 1872, by Mr. Gulick, where Mr. Gordon joined him. The other brethren are still at Kobe. Two ladies, Misses Dudley and Talcott, sailed from San Francisco on the 1st of March, 1873, to join the mission.

Recent Changes.

It is hardly needful to dwell upon the changes which have been going forward in Japan while missionary societies have thus been sending laborers there, and making some preparation for the great work to which it has seemed so probable that the Christian Church must soon be called. These changes have attracted much attention from the whole civilized world, and will be, perhaps, sufficiently indicated here by extracts from an article published a few months since in the "Missionary Record" of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and a communication from Mr. Davis, of the Board's mission, written at the close of his first year in Japan. The article in the "Record" states:

"Under various names, two Emperors, the one called the Tycoon and the other the Mikado, the former a military and secular sovereign, the latter a spiritual governor, technically supreme, have hitherto ruled the Empire of Japan, with its thirty-one millions of population, scattered over its three principal and its numberless smaller islands. These islands used to be divided into sixty-eight provinces, over every one of which a prince, under the name of Daimio, or Siomio was set as ruler, under the two Emperors, whose relation to one another we shall, in the course of this article, endeavor to explain.

“The recent revolution has been accomplished by the deposition of the Tycoon, and the assumption of his prerogatives by the Mikado, who has been, for four or five years, the sole Emperor of Japan. This abolition of the office of Tycoon has also completely changed the relation of the Daimios, and other local rulers, to the government and to the people. Formerly these princes had to reside in the city of Yedo for about half of their time, with their families, as hostages, under the eye of the Tycoon, who had the power to depose them, and who, through his council of state, surrounded them with an atmosphere of constant espionage. These circumstances lessen our surprise that the aristocracy of Japan was, to a large extent, a consenting party to the revolution which has sent the Tycoon to virtual and perpetual banishment, and has left the Mikado to rule without a rival, and to reconstruct the government.

“The present Japanese dynasty, that of the Mikado, stretches so far back into the past as to dwarf the antiquity of the oldest royal families of Europe. We are not aware that any man can call in question the unparalleled claim of the present Emperor, to a pedigree stretching back to the sixth century before Christ. This Emperor has witnessed the most remarkable revolution that has taken place in the empire since his family began to reign, twenty-four centuries ago. He is a young man of twenty-four years of age. His father and predecessor died on the 3d of February, 1867, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. The present Emperor was then a boy of seventeen; and within little more than a year of the beginning of his reign, May 16, 1868, the turning-point of a new régime, the hinge of Japanese history, was reached, unconsciously on his part and that of his fellow-countrymen. He has indeed manifested a small degree of vigor and intelligence, inasmuch as he has risen to his position in spite of his youth and the incredible bondage of those associations and traditions by which he was surrounded, and by which he was liable to be enslaved. It is not, however, to be imagined for a moment that he, or his immediate advisers, contemplated the marvelous consequences which have just begun to develop themselves, in changing the relations, the customs and habits, as well as the beliefs of that singular people. The change was not a human policy, but a divine and resistless providence.

"The present revolution must necessarily awaken religious inquiry, inasmuch as the Mikado, who was for ages shrouded in mystery, and viewed as an invisible divinity, has found it necessary to come forth into the arena of action, and take his place not only over his subjects, but side by side with his fellow-mortals. The recent revolution of 1868 was the overthrow of a previous revolution, which took place in the year 1142. Previous to that date, the Mikados of Japan were the only sovereigns of the empire. Their sovereignty, however, was of a spiritual kind. It made its appeal to the imagination, and based itself on sentiments of religion. To make use of an analogy, well understood in Europe, the Mikado was, up to the middle of the twelfth century, more a pope than a king. He shrouded himself in mystery; lived invisible in an immense palace in the city of Kioto, surrounded by a little army of guards, entrenched behind a bulwark of superstition, more potent for his defense than all his soldiers.

"The Mikado himself is believed to be the lineal descendant of the last of four gods who succeeded the goddess Ten-sio-dai-zin, believed to be the daughter of the god who created the world. Of this divine race of sovereigns who have ruled Japan, the present Mikado is the 122d. When the 76th in this long succession was on the throne in his secret place of thunder, that is, in the year 1141, disturbances arose which needed to be suppressed by the sword. The successful soldier, who became the general of the army which put down the insurrection, used his position as generalissimos have often done, to lift himself to power. This he did by severing the temporal from the spiritual prerogative, leaving the Mikado with his spiritual supremacy in his sacred city and palace, wrapped up in the power of his long and celestial pedigree, but stripped of all immediate exercise of temporal authority. Thus the power of the Mikado was divided between himself and the military emperor. For 716 years, up to the recent revolution in 1868, Japan had two Emperors, one visible and the other invisible, with certain acknowledged forms of subjection on the part of the temporal to the spiritual ruler.

"It would be an interesting but endless process of anatomy, to pursue into its details the complex constitution of this old government, which has worked longer than any other in human history, without more than one great change deserving the name of revolution. We refer to the revolution set up in 1142, and upset in 1868. The former change set the Tycoon on a throne nearly as high as that of the Mikado; the latter laid prostrate the Tycoon and put the Mikado on a solitary throne, by restoring that limb of his prerogative which was broken in the twelfth century.

"We cannot enter in this article into the growth of sentiment which, by gradually advancing among the ruling class, prepared the way for the abolition of the Tycoon's power. The facts, however, must be noted, as essential to the briefest narrative, that the old feudal aristocracy of Daimios and Siomios (the higher and lower grades of provincial governors) have been to a large extent superseded, and that an imperial parliament is on the eve of being elected, which will ere long, if the experiment succeed, exalt the mass of the people from a position of serfdom to the exercise of political rights; and will turn their mechanical education, in the arts of reading and writing, into mental and moral discipline, preparing them for a religious revolution, infinitely more benign than any political change can ever help them to conceive.

“If we enter into Japan now, when the people call us to ‘come over and help them,’ when Providence opens the way, and when the Lord of missions bids us go, there are the best of reasons why we should be hopeful of success among the people. Their repugnance to foreigners, too largely founded on their fear of Jesuitical treachery and mercantile rapacity, will quickly yield to the more genuine and just procedure of Americans and Europeans, promoting trade and propagating Christianity. The unscrupulous cupidity of Portuguese and Dutch traders, and the political ambition and tortuous policy of Jesuits, under the guise of Christianity, cannot repeat themselves.

“The call to enter Japan is new and almost startling. If it be a duty to ask for the opening of wide and effectual doors into great populations heretofore inaccessible, and if the prayer be answered, the Church has no choice but to enter in at these doors, so long as they stand open. The Japanese people are receptive and impressible. Their ambassadors are visiting the Western nations in quest of truth in every form. Our commerce has no difficulty in interpreting these things as a call to go. Is Christianity alone to be timid and calculating, lest it should land prematurely in that field?”

Mr. Davis wrote from Kobe, December 23, 1872:—

“We have been in Japan a year, having arrived here December 1, 1871. It has been a year of mighty changes in this empire; I desire to group a few of them together, and begin with those of which we have heard since leaving America, November 1, of last year:—

“The Daimios are deprived of their power and nine tenths of their revenue. The Samurai, the retainers of the Daimios, are thrown back upon their own resources for support. The Yetas, who have heretofore been considered something less than human, have had their disabilities removed, and are citizens.

"The first line of railroad has been most successfully opened, and a line of telegraph is finished through the length of the empire, putting it in the electric circuit of the world. The old restriction against the export of rice is removed, and twelve vessels are now in our bay, loading for America and Europe.

"The promiscuous use, by both sexes, of the public baths, has been prohibited; also the printing and sale of obscene books and pictures. The disgusting obscenity connected with some of the religious festivals is also prohibited, and following close upon these prohibitions comes the abolition of a system by which fathers and relatives sold young girls for a term of years, or for life, for the vilest purposes, and thus fed and kept up a most gigantic system of licentiousness, which has poisoned both the bodies and souls of the masses in this empire. This vast army of unfortunates are released from their contracts, and no more such contracts are to be made in the future.

"A truly gigantic system of education is planned, and the machinery to work it is preparing. The empire is to be divided into eight grand divisions, in each of which there are to be a university and thirty-two middle schools. Then there are to be in the empire 210 academies, and 53,760 common schools. From the middle schools and academies there are to be sent abroad for education, each year, 180 young men.

"Thousands of volumes of English text-books have been imported, and are found for sale in all the bookstores in the great cities. Translations have also been made, by the Japanese themselves, of many text-books, in Geography, Arithmetic, Philosophy, and even of the higher Mathematics. The old custom of shaving the crown of the head is forbidden, and men are requested to wear their hair in foreign style.

“And now, to close the year, comes a list of changes, great and sudden enough to startle the sleep of a Rip Van Winkle. Japan has heretofore had a variable year; using the lunar months; but with January 1, 1873, she is to start even with the world, and keep with her hereafter. The numerous and ancient holidays of the empire, on which they worshipped at their temples and shrines, are all abolished, except New Year's day, and the birthday of the Mikado, and Sunday is substituted for them. Officials are all to dress in foreign uniform, all the old laws are to be revised and printed in a foreign language, and all new ones are to be printed in the official daily newspaper of the capital.

“This array of changes does not look much like Japan's going back. She cannot go back. You might as well try to stop an ocean current with tissue paper as to stop Japan now.

“But how is it morally, spiritually? The department of religion, which since the accession of the Mikado, four years ago, has had the especial care of the Shintoo religion, and has been next to the department of state in importance, is abolished, and the department of religion is merged with that of education; and we see, in many of the other changes which have been made, those which should properly precede a decree of religious toleration, for which the government seems to be preparing. The first Christian Church has been organized, a church composed of nearly thirty young men of intelligence, many of whom bid fair to become preachers of the Word. The first Christian convention has been held, a committee appointed to translate the Bible, and a union basis agreed upon for native work. The magnificent Bible, sent out by the Bible Society, and which has waited here thirteen years for a favorable opportunity, has been presented to the Mikado. The first translations of parts of the Bible have been printed and are being circulated. There is, especially among the higher classes, a desire to examine the Bible, and to know about Christianity; a desire which must be speedily met either in Christianity or in infidelity."

Still another notable step in the line of progress has been announced more recently. In February, 1873, a number of time-honored edicts were removed from the edict-boards throughout the empire, and among these was the edict forbidding the adoption or profession of Christianity by the natives. No actual announcement of toleration was made, but in this quiet way the government is understood to have indicated its departure from the former proscriptive policy towards the Christian religion.

Thus is Japan open, at last, to the gospel of Christ; and a civilized race, numbering its tens of millions, remarkable for its intelligence and readiness to accept foreign ideas, seems ready to receive the beneficent influence of Christian truth.

SUPPLEMENT.

THE foregoing sketch was prepared by Rev. Mr. Woreester, early in 1873, and may still stand as a record of the beginnings of missionary enterprise in Japan. The changes which have taken place since that date are many and most remarkable. Politically, the nation has been moving forward by rapid strides to take her place by the side of Western nations. Reforms have been introduced in all departments. The government has freed itself from its entanglements with Shintooism and Buddhism and tolerates all religious faiths. There are said to be three hundred newspapers now printed within the empire, and many of them print articles in favor of Christianity. With the beginning of 1886 the old system of personal administration by a Privy Council was abolished and a responsible ministry established under the leadership of the most enlightened men of the empire. A national parliament is promised in 1890. There are now three hundred miles of railway, with telegraph and steamship lines connecting Japan with all parts of the world. An imperial order directs that English be taught in all the schools of the empire, which number about thirty thousand, with over three million pupils. Within the past thirty-five years the foreign commerce of Japan has increased from one quarter of one million to seventy millions.

The American Board has now two missions within the empire, the Northern Japan Mission (with its centre at Niigata, on the northwestern coast) having been established in 1883.

In 1873 formal preaching was commenced at Kobe, with an attendance increasing from ten to eighty. In 1874 two churches were organized — one at Kobe and one at Osaka. In 1875 a church was organized at Sanda, an out-station eighteen miles north of Kobe; also one at Hiogo. In 1876 three churches were organized in different localities at Kioto. In 1877 the second church was gathered in Osaka, over which was ordained and installed as pastor the first native Japanese ever set apart in that empire to the Christian ministry — Mr. Neesima, having been ordained in the United States. During the same year a church was formed at Tamon-dori between Kobe and Hiogo. The nine churches connected with our Board had at this time over 240 members. In 1878 Mr. Neesima again visited his former home at Annaka (eighty miles northwest of Tokio), where he preached the gospel on his first return from the United States. The seed he then planted had been watered to some extent by students sent from Kioto, and Mr. Neesima at this time baptized thirty persons and organized them into a self-supporting church. A church was also organized in Akashi, an out-station of Kobe. In April, 1879, a new station was opened at Okayama, a city on the Inland Sea, one hundred miles west of Kobe, having about thirty-five thousand inhabitants, and in the midst of a populous province. Messrs. Berry, Cary, and Pettee and Miss Wilson were located here, and the welcome accorded them was altogether without precedent. During 1879 four new churches were organized : one (the Third) at Osaka, one at Hikone, one at Yokaichi, and one at Imabari, on the island of Shikoku, and one at Tokio. In October, 1880, a church was formed at Okayama.

These seventeen churches had, in 1881, 669 members, of whom 192 were added during the previous year on confession of their faith. Ten of these churches had at that time native pastors installed over them.

Since that date there has been a large increase in the number of churches. Two were organized in 1882, four in 1884, and seven in 1885. The year 1884 was marked by a great spiritual blessing, giving new life to the churches, the native ministry, and to the schools. The revival in the Kioto Training School was most marked. In the year 1883-84 not less than 736 persons were received to the 22 churches, and the report of the next year (1884-85) gave 30 churches, with 1,027 additions on confession. This was a gain of 55 per cent. At the close of the year 1884-85 the 30 churches in the Japan Mission had 2,752 members. Twenty-five of these churches were self-supporting, and many of them were engaged earnestly in evangelistic work in the region about them. The Northern Japan Mission reported three churches, with 104 members.

In 1874 Mr. Greene removed to Yokohama to take part, with representatives of other American missions in Japan, in the work of translating the Scriptures into Japanese. This work of translation progressed favorably, so that in 1880 the whole New Testament appeared, and several editions have been issued by the American Bible Society. The people have purchased copies with great eagerness, and some even who have no love for Christianity have been engaged in selling books that were in such demand.

In 1877 Mr. Neesima took up his residence at Kioto, formerly the seat of the Mikado's government and known as the spiritual capital of the empire. Messrs. Davis and Doane followed, and what is known as the Doshisha, or the Kioto Training School, was opened November 29, 1875, with eight scholars, of whom all but one were Christians. Though the Buddhist and Shinto priests bitterly opposed, permission was also given, in 1876, to other families to reside in Kioto. A year after the opening of the Training School it had eighty-five boarding pupils, of whom about forty were hopefully pious, and it was said: "We have thirteen preaching-places now, and every Christian young man in the school is looking up such a place for himself." Sixteen of these members of the school had been under the care of Captain Janes, in a scientific school at Kumamoto, which an ex-daimio had engaged him to take charge of. In 1879 the Training School had 127 pupils, of whom 15 completed their theological studies and entered upon various departments of evangelical work, several of them as pastors of churches. Since that time it has been constantly enlarging until in all its departments it has about 240 students. It has furnished a large number of pastors and teachers for the churches of Japan.

Girls' Schools have been established at Kobe, Osaka, and Kioto, attended during the year 1885 by 224 pupils, of whom a large portion were professing Christians. In these schools instruction is given in both the English and the Japanese languages. The native Christians assumed the whole expense of erecting the building which is now in use for the Osaka School. These Girls' Schools are under the care of missionary ladies from America.

Medical work has proved eminently useful in preparing the way for directly evangelistic labors, though the progress of the work has been so remarkable that such help in introducing the missionaries seems less necessary than formerly. When Dr. Berry arrived in Japan, in 1872, he was most cordially received by the physicians of Kioto, and ever since all medical missionaries have had unusual facilities for prosecuting missionary work. (See the Missionary Herald for April, 1879, page 130.) Dr. Taylor has a dispensary at Osaka, which is exerting a marked influence in all that region.

Much has been accomplished by means of various publications issued by mission agency. Tracts and books have been prepared, and large editions have been sold. A religious weekly newspaper, the Shichi Ichi Zappo (Weekly Messenger), commenced in January, 1876, has proved a decided success. But the literary work of the mission has been practically turned over into competent native hands, leaving our missionaries free for the work of preaching and teaching.

In January, 1878, a Native Missionary Society was organized, which from the beginning has united the churches in effective labors. It collects money and sends out its laborers into different parts of the empire and seems to be prepared to take up, as fast as is practicable, the work of evangelizing the land. The Japanese seem to respond quickly to all suggestions as to self-support, and some of the most cautious missionaries now in Japan predict that the native church will within the present generation assume control of the evangelizing agencies in that land.

PROTESTANT MISSIONS IN JAPAN.

Changes are so rapid and so great in the missionary work in Japan that statistics are old before they can be collected, tabulated, and sent to America.

The reports from the churches for the year 1885 have just been published and show a very encouraging increase in all directions.

The whole number of churches on the first of January, 1886, was 168; the number of communicants was 11,678; which is an increase during the year of 3,715 members. The total contributions were $24,140.20 (Mexicans), which is $6,415.15 in excess of the gifts of 1884.
